Old-Time Surveying Methods Have Changed

J. A. Campbell is Not of the Old "Wagon-Wheel School of Surveyors of Territorial Days.

Kansas was surveyed the first time by the United States government on contract. It was strictly a political job and the most important thing about it was collecting contract price for the work. That's why a good many Kansas quarter sections have considerably less than 160 acres, while some have more.

Oldtimers used to say the surveyors tied a red rag to a wagon wheel and counted the revolutions when they came to laying off the section lines, and that they threw a stone out of the wagon and buried it wherever it happened to quit rolling—making that the section and half-section corner monument. That account probably was a libel on those old surveyors who are gone now and n't defend themselves. But the fact remains that Shawnee county lines as laid down by the government aren't straight with the world and never will be.

But that sort of haphazard public surveying is entirely out of fashion when the government turned the surveying business over to the county. The county doesn't furnish its surveyor any instruments. He has to supply his own and if you happen not to elect a very high-class surveyor, the one you do elect is likely not to furnish a very good set of instruments, and he is likely to put a few more jogs in the already jagged lines the government surveyors left to work from. J. A. Campbell, who is asking re-election as the Republican candidate for the office of surveyor, is a product of modern training and takes his profession seriously.

Circumstances have conspired to create more work both of private and public nature for the county surveyor than was formerly the case. This has helped make possible the maintenance of a permanent staff of assistants. Mr. Campbell is very often rushed with work, but this is very largely due to the fact that people who know his methods are anxious to have his services, and they are willing to take their turn, when necessary, rather than to have it done by others.

When Mr. Campbell finally retires from office, now or "er, as the voters may decide, he expects to continue in his professional work here. It behooves him to maintain his professional reputation.

This year his name will appear as candidate for renomination by the Republicans of the county on August 4. That being the case he has a set of first-class instruments. In fact everything of professional equipment in his office is his personal property and it is good. He has introduced modern recording methods and he puts in a permanent monument wherever he locates a section corner. There are only three of the old government monuments left and one of them is just about 200 feet off the point where it ought to be.

This official record and map which he makes has its importance. For twenty-five years or more before he went into office this sort of thing had been neglected. The county lost sight of roads that had been ordered opened, condemned and paid for. It is a fact that in many instances pieces of road have been paid for twice and even three times by this county just because some surveyor neglected to preserve a record, the road grading was delayed and the matter forgotten.
